FIGHTING CHANCE

Organization Is a Life Saver

One year after opening, help thousands cope with cancer

BY RACHAEL SHAW

It is exactly one year since "Fighting Chance" opened up its office in a little alley off Main Street, Sag Harbor. Since then the charity, which is committed to providing support and information for cancer patients and caregivers, has grown remarkably.

The charity's story actually begins two years ago, in 2003, when Fighting Chance first came into existence. The first twelve months were spent preparing what Duncan Darrow, Fighting Chance's Chairman, describes as "a yellow pages for cancer care." This guide, "Coping with Cancer on the East End" is the focal point of Fighting Chance's efforts to provide support for cancer sufferers in the local community. Compiled with the help of members of the medical profession, it provides patients and caregivers with the necessary tools to find answers to all kinds of questions concerning cancer and the practical difficulties that are involved in its treatment.

"Fighting Chance realizes how important it is to have bridges with the medical community," says Darrow, and to this end, a Medical Advisory Committee has been set up with doctors and administrators from hospitals such as Southampton, Riverhead and Memorial Sloan Kettering. Janine Veto, Deputy Director of Fighting Chance says, "it's our job to build up doctor confidence in Fighting Chance, so they see our guide really can be a helpful part of patient counseling." Kerri Zampini Robinson has also come on board. Formerly Director of Post-Treatment at Memorial Sloan Kettering, Robinson offers a unique insight as an oncological social worker and will be a liaison with the Medical Advisory Committee. She praises the guide saying that, "it gives them [cancer patients and caregivers] what they need. It is relevant and informative."

Over the past year, Fighting Chance has seen its website "explode," now receiving over 4,000 hits every month.

Further evidence of the charity's success is provided by their recent partnership with Cancer Care, a national non-profit that provides free, professional services to people with cancer. The two organizations have co-published the new edition of the guide but Darrow says that there is more to the collaboration - "Cancer Care is a national organization. If we have a caller with a significant level of stress we can now refer them to Cancer Care to ensure that they receive the help they need."

"We're working with cancer patients at the grass roots level in Suffolk County," he said. "We know a lot about local resources because we sort of 'wrote the book' on that. So, out here, we can really help cancer patients map out the support system they need to improve their chances of survival."

150 per year The number of counseling sessions conducted at our office by Karrie Robinson with cancer patients and their caregivers.

300 per year The number of telephone counseling sessions Heather has with cancer patients, helping them to better understand their disease and navigate the health care system.

300 per year The number of advisory emails sent by Jessica in response to questions and concerns expressed by visitors to our website visitors.

4,000 per year The approximate number of copies of our resource guide (entitled "Coping With Cancer on the East End") that are distributed; many are downloaded off our website, where the entire 75-page Guide can be examined. Many of our requests for counseling, by the way, come from the Guide's readership.

80,000 per year The approximate number of "page views" from our website each year -- mostly by visitors who read select chapters of the Guide, and often return again with family and friends.

$275,000 What we raised in charitable contributions in 2005

What is most important about these numbers is the message they send to the cancer patients in our communities: If you are fighting cancer. . there are many others who will fight by your side.

FIGHTING CHANCE

Hope at a Day About Cancer Treatment

BY JENNIFER LANDES

On one of the last temperate, sunny Saturdays of the year, some 300 people took time to sit in the darkened semicircle of the Bay Street Theatre this week to participate in a program dedicated to cancer.

Although the event might sound depressing on its surface, it was a day devoted to hope. And about 200 of those people who either had survived cancer, were being treated for cancer, or were recently diagnosed, were offered a measure of help and encouragement in their struggles.

Fighting Chance, a nonprofit Sag Harbor organization that provides information and access to resources for East End cancer patients, organized the symposium with Southampton Hospital...

Dr. Norton described how advances in treatment, many of them in recent years, have brought doctors closer to eradicating the disease. Dr. Altorki said that early detection techniques were allowing lung cancer patients a better chance at surgery and ultimate survival. Breast cancer and lung cancer are two of the most common cancers in the country and lung cancer is one of the deadliest.

After the doctors' presentations, a panel of local doctors, Louis Avvento, Renu Hausen, and Marilyn McLaughlin, joined them to answer the audience's questions about treatment advances, drug trials, the role of politics in getting money for research, the role of the environment as a cause of cancer, and how to deal with treatment complications...

Providing an intimate look at the process of treatment and the issues involved were a group of five cancer survivors. Karrie Zampini Robinson, an oncological social worker who is the director of clinical programs at Fighting Chance and served as the conference's moderator, called the experience of cancer "a series of crises" from diagnosis to treatment. "No one can help you more than people who have been there," she observed...

According to Mr. Darrow, out of 62 counties in New York State, Suffolk is ranked seventh in number of people diagnosed with cancer.

To address the growing need, Mr. Darrow said Fighting Chance will try to offer smaller workshops over the course of the year on specific cancers in addition to larger conferences. More information on the topics presented at the conference can be found at the Web site fightingchance.org. A copy of the free book "Coping with Cancer on the East End" can be ordered there.
